

Human Rights Day 2024

A joint letter from UK civil society coordinated by the British Institute of Human Rights

Today, we celebrate International Human Rights Day – the anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR) which, for the first time, enshrined the fundamental rights that belong to us all, simply for being human.

2024 also marks the 75th anniversary of the Council of Europe, of which the UK was a founding member. This Council, and its inaugural European Convention on Human Rights, marked a coming together of countries across Europe to solidify their commitment to the UDHR and to protecting universal human rights.

The Council and the Convention marked not just a legal shift but a practical one – a move to ensure that people did not just have human rights but could own them and access them in a real and tangible way. Putting Convention rights into practice relies not just on courts and legislation but on the everyday actions of all its signatories. The Convention is part of a legal system but also a system of community and co-operation, of mutual respect for the rights and duties that were established in the Convention and now echoed in the UK's own Human Rights Act.

This is the same system that makes human rights real not just on the international stage but in all the many communities that form the beating heart of the UK. The collaboration between social worker and client to create a person-centred care plan; a family's advocacy on behalf of their loved one; the interpreter facilitating conversations between public body workers and people accessing services – these are all part of what brings human rights to life. These are the "small places close to home" referred to by Eleanor Roosevelt on creation of the UDHR – that international agreement that led first to the European Convention on Human Rights, and then to the UK's Human Rights Act, and then to the everyday actions that we celebrate today.

These actions, and the legal frameworks that enable them, lay the foundations for all of us to live lives characterised by equal dignity and respect. But to fully realise our human rights and what it means to uphold universal human rights, there are many actions still to be taken and duties to be met by those in positions of public power – from raising awareness to improving accountability.

We call on political leaders to reaffirm the UK's commitment to its human rights obligations, both nationally and internationally, and to make their own commitments to supporting a culture of respect for human rights across the UK.
